THE AD POLICY FIELD GUIDE

How to advertise health and wellness services on Google and Meta without getting your account shut down.

Health and wellness businesses face a problem other businesses never think about.

Whether you run a regenerative clinic, a massage studio, a hyperbaric center or a Reiki practice, the ad platforms review what you say about health. A single rejected ad can put a whole account at risk.

The answer is not to stop advertising. It is to lead with the experience and with education, send people to pages that follow the same rules, and let your follow-up do the selling. This is marketing guidance, not legal advice. Have your counsel review your claims.

01

NEVER IMPLY A CONDITION ON META

WHAT HAPPENS NOW

Meta's advertising standards do not allow ads that assert or imply personal attributes, and physical and mental health are on that list. Meta's own examples: "Depression counseling" is allowed. "Do you have diabetes?" is not.

THE FIX

1. Talk about the service, not the viewer: "Sports massage for runners" instead of "Is your back killing you?"
2. Lead with what the session is like, who it is for, and how to book.
3. Review every ad against this rule before it goes live.

> WHAT TO MEASURE
>
> Ad rejection rate and account quality status, checked weekly.

02

PROMISE THE EXPERIENCE, NOT THE OUTCOME

WHAT HAPPENS NOW

Health claims are judged by what a reasonable person takes away, not only the exact words. "Cures sciatica", "heals trauma" or "reverses aging" invite rejected ads, complaints and regulatory risk.

THE FIX

1. Describe the experience: "a quiet 60 minute sound bath" or "deep tissue work on the back and shoulders".
2. Use "may", "some clients report" and "results vary" honestly, never as a fig leaf for a big promise.
3. Keep a claims file: every claim you use, and the source that supports it.

>
> Every live claim mapped to a source in the claims file.

03

KNOW WHAT GOOGLE ALLOWS

WHAT HAPPENS NOW

Google's healthcare policy does not allow ads that promote speculative or experimental medical treatments, or cell and gene therapies, with a narrow exception for FDA licensed or approved therapies in the United States. Stem cell clinics, this one is for you.

THE FIX

1. Google does allow ads for cell or gene therapies that are exclusively educational or informational in nature.
2. Build search campaigns around education: what the process is, who it may suit, what questions to ask.
3. Keep treatment promotion, prices and outcomes off the ad and the landing page it sends to.

>
> Disapproved ads per month. The goal is zero.

04

HYPERBARIC HAS CLAIM RULES TOO

WHAT HAPPENS NOW

The FDA has cleared hyperbaric chambers for a specific list of medical conditions, and it has warned consumers that hyperbaric therapy is not proven to treat conditions outside that list, such as cancer and autism.

THE FIX

1. Market the session: what it is, how it feels, how long it takes, and who runs it.
2. Never name a condition in an ad or on a page that falls outside the cleared uses.
3. Show safety and accreditation clearly. The FDA tells consumers to look for a facility accredited by the Undersea and Hyperbaric Medical Society.

>
> Every ad and page checked for condition claims before launch.

05

THE PAGE MATTERS AS MUCH AS THE AD

WHAT HAPPENS NOW

Platforms review the landing page too. A clean ad that sends people to a page full of outcome promises gets rejected anyway.

THE FIX

1. Build education pages for paid traffic: the process, the practitioner, the space, the questions to ask.
2. Put the booking form on that page, not a list of conditions you treat.
3. Show credentials, certifications and bios clearly. Trust converts better than hype.

> WHAT TO MEASURE
>
> Conversion rate on education pages versus your old pages.

06

LET FOLLOW-UP DO THE SELLING

WHAT HAPPENS NOW

When the ad cannot make the pitch, businesses feel stuck. The pitch belongs in the conversation, after someone raises their hand.

THE FIX

1. Answer every inquiry fast, on text, call and email.
2. Have a trained person walk through goals, the experience and the investment.
3. Nurture the undecided for months with useful content.

>
> Cost per booked client, not cost per click.

07

OWN CHANNELS YOU CONTROL

WHAT HAPPENS NOW

If all your clients come from one ad account, one policy change can empty your calendar overnight.

THE FIX

1. Grow search visibility for the questions people actually ask, including AI search answers.
2. Build an email and text list you own.
3. Earn reviews and referrals every month, on purpose.

> WHAT TO MEASURE
>
> Share of new clients that came from channels you own.
